

THE BELOIT POETRY JOURNAL

Volume 3 - Number 3 Spring 1953

CONTENTS

NORMAN FRIEDMAN	Wolf's Den, Connecticut	1
WILLIAM W. CHANCE	The Returning	2
KAY JOHNSON	Three Poems	3
WARREN HENNRICH	Metamorphosis in the Metropole	5
GLEN BACON	Four Sonnets	6
EARL HENDLER	Oncoming Sea	8
BERNARD RAYMUND	Prophecy by Water	9
NEIL WEISS	One Fine Night	10
MARGARET TOARELLO	For Men Who Govern Nations	11
ROBERT SUND	Poem for Betty	12
CHARLES EATON	Ceremony for Bells	13
CARROLL COATES	The Children	14
CARROLL ARNETT	The Mexican Fishermen	15
NELSON BRYANT	Wander, Dear, Far and Wonder the Hour	16
ANTHONY OSTROFF	Two Poems	17
AMADOR DAGUIO	Off the Aleutian Islands	19
HERBERT MORRIS	Dusks	20
BAXTER HATHAWAY	Song	22
CHRIS BJERKNES	Snow Heron	23
HERMAN SALINGER	Recollections of . . .	24
CHARLES G. BELL	Two Poems	26
FREDERICK ECKMAN	Mountaintop, Solus	27
MORTIMER SLAIMAN	It Was Crowded in the Park	28
ELIZABETH ANDERSON	Seven Grains of Corn	29
OPINION		30

THE BELOIT POETRY JOURNAL
Volume 3 - Number 3 Spring 1953

WOLF'S DEN, CONNECTICUT

Israel Putnam went him down,
 doing what he had to do;
the wolf she was fearful he would own,
 and so sly she left him nary a clue.

Israel Putnam went down to see if he could stop the fearful bitch;
he set him firm so not to flee,
 and clenched his teeth to face the witch.

Seventy slaughtered sheep betrayed
 the need of rope and light and gun:
Israel Putnam was unafraid and shot her; avenged them every one.

He shot her by the shine of her own angry eyes, the last remaining of her kind alone and down she fell without complaining.

Israel Putnam, to give him his due,
 flung her carcass off the cliff;
now sheep are glad and merry too:
 the fearful wretch is silent and stiff.

Norman Friedman

2

THE RETURNING

Did sometime last night you leave me?
Did you as padded as silence, loosing your figured broidery,
Arise noctambularly and slip like design from my presence?

Did you quit warmth of our pillow, gently untwine us,
Straighten the quilted covering
And over the inaudibles hovering Lay hushed good-by?

It seemed in drawn midnight I heard Light touch on the half-shuttered pane. Was it passing bird

Of its mate bereft
And singing cleft;
Or was it a spiralling vine that tendriled in dreaming,
Some moon-nymph a tune on the moonlight teeming,
Some god who stirred?

This known: there was hurt hiatus.
For length of a nebular gasp, there were light years between us,
Void so unfilled
That (though this unwilling)
I breached the black veiling with scream (Oh mare of the midnight!),
When you in awakening awe, when with your lips on the lovesright,
You stilled me thus.

William W. Chance

THE TREES ADVANCING . . .

What are the tree stalks talking about as they walk about, elephantine, tossing their wrinkled
 hides about a tender tusk

Like waves, like heavy marching hooves they billow over hills, stalk hidden vales sturdily people hills.

Ancient, ageless, black in the day
 green in the light, moon-ghost bridled in the night refuge of the spider's web, roar of earth's black layer the living trees stride like giant myths from unread folklore
 wedged like crowbars between the day and night.

Kay Johnson

NOW IT SEEMS AS IF SOME GIANT PLAN

Now it seems as if some giant plan were caching me, Assuring me, as some great crinkled spider's web evolves
 its love,

That I am caught, it's dew's stunned jewel
 To jangle on its webbed boughs,
 Lilt, sift, wait, and wonder
 Until the entrancing spider does finger over The paths I spun her and suck me full of night-time wonder till mummied

4

In her breath's chrysalis I am cut loose
To fall as lightly as a leaf.

Oh, insect wonder, that we the prey should be
To that most-dreaded spider and to the smolder
Of the forest floor dedicate
Our caught blue buzz.

Kay Johnson

THE HORSES

Rough moments like wild horses hard to ride
Pace around the time-face of my clock. Days
Become a child's night dream: I am not strong enough
Each moment, now, to ride these horses.
Invisibly they trample me.

Once I caught a white one. It bowed its knee.
Wordlessly, my fingers
Clutched into its breathing mane;
We flew through black forests,
Lept ditches, pitches fences far behind.

Because heaven is these horses
Black, red, grey, and white that daily travel
Each moment of our clock.

Kay Johnson

METAMORPHOSIS IN THE METROPOLE

Caught in the clutch of the condensing cold
He watched the moon accumulate its ring
Of wintery mold without concern.

Embers may freeze and icicles burn,
He thought, before a man like myself will learn
To understand his own desires.

Each particle of ice depending from His forest of overhanging wires
Seemed pointed at the street to make him see

That sand will be rock and rock will be sand
In timeless metamorphosis before his eye
Will be able to trace or his hand to hold

This wick which autumn's graceful change
May mix with twilight's descending cold,
As mist too dense for a man to arrange

Encircles the edge of his moon with gold
In a manner at once expected and strange
Since his mind is made aware of that mold

Whose icy circles make each star burn
Like a prophet predicting spring's return—
While the moon, encircled by clutching trees,

Makes icicles burn and church spires freeze,
If not at their tips then at least where each clock
Proves time will be sand and sand will be rock.

Warren C. Henrich

6

FOUR SONNETS

- I They must have been a refuge, those tall tales they told on lonesome voyages at sea—long isolations where the mind soon fails to chart precisely truth from fantasy.
A profane sailor, unbecomingly serene through calms of superstition, awe correctly reefing pirate prosody, talked piously of ghosts his one eye saw;
the yellow hair that grew and curled and waved from a yard-arm each time the moon was full;
the phantom sad faced monkey so depraved that hardened men swore him most wonderful; safe refuge for a lonely mariner these witnessed tales of things that never were.
- II They called the old man "Chinee Egg" because his head was slick as artificial eggs of thin white chinaware, but their guffaws at his well polished skull, and at the pegs of pink sea shell, one through each ear, their laughs, their fun of him, were edged with the fine spray of jealous pity. Profane epitaphs for him were never meant to brief his stay.
They knew at each full moon his avid eye crept to the high yard-arm where yellow hair was seen by him alone, and they knew why.
And too they knew that nothing anywhere of this fetich private to his delight.

- III From the Marquesas westward half a day incredibly and suddenly appeared a sad faced monkey, phantom stowaway, with silver whiskers and great eyes that leered obscenely through a rusted quadrant. Men accustomed to odd visitations on shipboard stared at this scurvy citizen and found no word in all their lexicon disreputably sharp enough to shave
the moment of its unreality.
He sat there busy in the icy cave of their shocked vision making drollery indecent, and appalling even these salt crusted souls with fearful lecheries.
- IV No other refuge have I but these quick bright structures built when somewhere many weeks from safety, suddenly the mind is sick, and through the rigging of the eye there shrieks a momentary wind. Then on the deck of vision, swept clean by the now calm squall,
I, like those sailors, turn to architect and carefully construct the many small details and larger lines of apparition.
Fanatic zeal in craftsmanship insures these elements of mutable condition safe permanence, and from nowhere secures a climate suitable to keep the beams and joists of fantasy from warping seams.

Glenn Bacon

8

ONCOMING SEA

The black rock holds the rising water up against the coming in of other water.
We all look to someone else's struggle for art and tend to recognize a fish, for example, by a glass-eye's experience with it reflecting to the top of the canvas the stroke establishing its spray and shimmering scales.
Critics discuss the esthetics of all movement where the bodies of the dedicated dance in the broken sea. Only those with the artist's eye, like the pensive stare of a drowned man descending backwards to his sleep, can have that knowledge of the tide that drags and lifts us all. Out from the shattered line of shore the spray delineates such shooting lines that order with a calculated rage
the sum of this disordered world they know.

The large forms of nature command us all to be the poems that pulse in the sounds of shells, that swish in the fluid fronts of crabs, each claiming in its blindness, "I am I", tho the ocean roll him down, throwing up its monuments to anonymity.
Within the deepest curve of each wave's embrace the rock is held like an act of final faith.
The horizon is hurried by a brush that paints hosannas to the dead and dying, showing each in his own way how to believe.
The boiling vapors pile themselves in cones,
and in their tidal continuities

the artist's pencil finds the mobile motive.
 Serene and sacred, every random scrawl across that parallelogram of sides of rock and smoking seas and shooting spray runs like a hurried signature of God.

Earl Hendler

PROPHECY BY WATER

Understepping us, the magic of the pool holds (hand in hand) us three:
 Daddy (all hair), and Four, and chubby-buttocked Two,
 moving in bee and bird-song habited subaqueous green.

Our toes seek hold prehensile upon slippery stone where crawfish peer twiddling antennae, waving claw at Two's ten coral buds.

The interlineations whelks have spread, script of Persian, in the mirror's floor explicated could not read the fate of Four, nor where would fall that slender shade to limbo—
 Two's everlasting loss, their father's grief.

Bernard Raymund

10

ONE FINE NIGHT

Floated all the way
Up to his room;
Soaped the right key,
Inserted his doom.

Crept under the door,
Lost the light;
Fell down on the floor,
Very sad night.

Clearly someone had hid
In the closet:
Asked, not to go mad,
Who was it?

Found the knob in his hand,
Yelled come out—
It did: no one's husband
Wielded the knout.

Sailed deep into purple;
Water was trod.
Roses flew from the steeple Straight to God.

Neil Weiss

FOR MEN WHO GOVERN NATIONS

Then law by order of a species unbeneficent nowhere but on occasion—under circumstances—for when love having resource to faith with trust to span an ocean
 —matter of fact—in man's esteem for man, succumbed by dint of this conviction to no cause sooner than to any—then because the times roared murder, worse cried hunger—pitiously cried,
 appeals urging immediate action thrust down against invincible barriers sighed.
 So yet—but these are instances time can not rust.
 Things follow things with much consistence. If after the cymbals, lightning clear with prescience, white with shot
 here—there—papers fluttering and the scrawls—if after the sham what survived commenced extending along one—two several! pairs of feet concluding there—yours but ah how chivalrous they clicked approving once—do you recall—maneuvers in a rut—Men died and valor was the pale courageous green of April rising and a lily singing:
 possibly why—you know—but there were others—thaw
 with an insipid pity, trinkets, speeches anything

12

so slight in shadow limping and so sad as little people stripped of Christmases then and forever; how having so nobly tripped across a slain school-yard, do you propose now to restore the patched mittens no one—no one at all will ever find . . .
even perchance a muffler dangling from a tree though in your mind.

Margaret Toarelo

POEM FOR BETTY

I remember saying your legs were moving like a flight of geese
in a lovely storm

I remember geese
just before the dawn flying in one direction
through a natural season

I remember centers
warm centers of old delight
I remember hoping
I would not need to remember.

Robert Sund

CEREMONY FOR BELLS

Magnolia,

That once was white and still,
 Ring now like bells of terror,
 That first rang hymeneal
 For marriage of my youth,
 Ring now the bells of terror.
 After the bridal song such evil
 Walked as the bride of all I feel,
 The veil of veils withdrawn
 Showed nothing but the face of truth
 Beneath the shuddering down of flowers on the lawn.

Burial, remember,

At the tolling of the funeral in the boughs,
 The petals gathered in cadaverous white,
 Corpses laid to flower, palm by palm
 The water carried from the wells
 Until the drouth of country graves arouse
 The eternal, never to be dispelled, mirage:
 Sockets of burnt cities far in time,
 The cities near at hand, ready to be lit.
 O for the death of deaths, the bells
 Ring all their ghosts among the trees with rage.

Ah, sweet country rest,

If the city flare in sleep,
 Let me cull from dream
 One floating corolla of fire
 Though it be quenched in morning's pallor
 And smoke in some charred chasm of desire.

14

Surely, for this, the fire of dream
The world of beauty crossed with terror,
That I, one hand invulnerable, might keep To wrest one drowning flower, fingers plunging like a dove,
And ring us, burning, back to love.

Charles Edward Eaton

THE CHILDREN

Between my spirit and the burning sun,
O, Pilgrims in the landscape, men on horseback,
White herons rising radiant against the green
Of world and sky, in wonder have I seen How everything is one, beneath the sun;—
The cricket-children of the inviolable grass,
Lean veins of wheat, goldblood of life,
The perfect water, all, all issuing from the hand
That made us one, whose one command
Created harmonies of leaves, hearts, stars and grass;—
And I have watched the eyes of children,
Under the noon, shine like a holy day,
Sparkle with the lifting light of birds,
Sweat-sheen of horses, but I have not found words
Equal to this love translating us, the children.

Carroll Coates

THE MEXICAN FISHERMEN

The surf boiled black, cold
 On the moonstruck sand of the old Aztec old beach at San Pedro

And the men . . . pacing the sand,
 Listening, baiting their salty lust.
 '(The grunyan land.)

"O God,
 Thou of the Fish! Thou devil!
 Spawn of spectral shifting bands!

"Slow! we invoke thee!
 (Ah! shall smoke thee!)
 Nando! tend the fire—See!

"Bring the nets, O quick quick
 But slow O
 Easy . . . then—damn the Moon!"

This moon, this clown winks off and on Through careless clouds, exits laughing
 At the men and their loss of the mocking fish

Who, churning the out-tide, spurning
 The men, their worship, are ignored by the boy Nando. He hops about on the oozing

Sand, peeved for the men at the sea's Scraping smooth his foot prints.
 An hour; two; all night

He cries to join their frantic jokes,
 Not knowing tonight's ritual will be,
 Tomorrow, a laugh that echoes, echoes.

Carroll Arnett

WANDER, DEAR, FAR AND WONDER THE HOUR.

Wander, dear, far and wonder the hour
When our green arms grew full, it is May
And all anticipation. Fruit is blossom now,
Eat with your eyes and wait the round flesh where flower
Was gay on the wind, for summer is near.

Wake in the night;
Take one beside you to task for his sleep
And wade the dark tide in the ring of the moon.

When gold silk burns in crew cut fields
The fruit grows old, black hank of age
Brittle with forgotten heat.

Go then in remembrance woods and fill
Your skull with the fruit of your days;
The cribbage years have come, the slow
Persuasion that takes you from desire.

But now the pilgrim trees
Have stood to chant our praise, the ringing Marriage of our days is told in every dell.
The bell of promise tolls us where no doubt dwells.

Nelson Bryant

ON THE COAST, WHERE FALLS ARE DANGEROUS

The wind blows wet and cold, uproots the road.
The fields, turned howling and miserable, clamor
About the house. The whining morning grew
To an afternoon gale and knocks the stones about Like bones. Why does the fire fret so? O why?
Outside the sea is baffled by the cliffs
And roars even through the heavy blast
Of that terrifying sky. But surely the house
Is safe, it is so old. Its history
Must protect it—it has learned to outlast
These storms. The cliffs have beaten back such seas
For more centuries than we can think. Die?
They never thought it. Nor this house. Be Sensible. It is only the fall storms come.
Every year they come. We've seen them before.
Of course the house will stand. It's stood a long time,
And worse than this by a bit. We've only to wait
And get used to things, and by and by—
Yes, but look how the fire worries It Hears that wind and wet! Hear the roof Creak? Could we brace those beams? Age
Is no security for future storms.
Ah, how the rain does beat and the wind howl!
The walls are stone, and maybe sound enough,
But the roof, the windows—how the glass bends!
We've not prepared for this war, and yet we knew It had to come. Listen! Listen! Look!
At the door, at the door—

Anthony Ostroff

SOREN REGINA

I write, he said. Too stupid to fly, Too impure to do real magic, I,
To work the transformation in a wink,
Must painfully and tediously think.

I fly, said she. Miraculously light,
I am too rare and beautiful to write.
I alone can dance the clouds and sing
The fragile air to shapes of anything.

I, he said, desire you—and to soar.
But I am heavy, the world is either/or,
And I know that to be is not to be content.
So heavy, I am determined on descent.

Then burn! she sang. For flames consume the air!
Your weight will win! I will be yours somewhere!
I am confused! he, flaming, cried. Undone!
You are mine to burn? Bright Love! What have I won?

Anthony Ostroff

OFF THE ALEUTIAN ISLANDS

I have reaped the sickle edge of rain,
Rain harvests that had no grass.
In youth I let instead the lusty mushroom Discover me.

Also have I known
The craving blade of rainwash, clean
To my clean bones. But overnight I rose Upright in marsh ground, naked Looming with rain.

Now, I do not cry; here; because I am bigger Than a sea gull. A sea gull screams;
Urgently leaps into the wind
Following the concave shine of water.

Does it break, irrevocably,
The all-pathos of mirrors,
To look back at rain memories, unvexed?
A gull cries now to the other
Sea gulls—follow me.

Follow me.

Amador Daguio

20

DUSKS

- I A day, deeply, after it all has paled past pink and rust, is only, from here unto my farthest touching where the stars are nailed at sentinel stations, what we have been and loved.
(I have not spoken and I have not moved from where you left me in the pearl and blue great gold of morning that day was). I am some infinite sky retaining in my span all that a day was, no less a purple to rock and rip me in, no less a dark, a deep.
This day is only all that we were, then,
night in its own pure holding needing ten depths as dark to match us now, to keep this day as sea, we as the waters' lock.
- II Yesterday Brooklyn was green when we were there, October warm and leaves, though old, alive to this last gentleness of breath and air, this tremulous breath and air that will revive all of you in me in its aching sweep.
Yesterday Brooklyn was light with all the dark it is of dying grass within the deep grey of the winter sun in the stone, stark, terrible streets (the children falsely warm).
- This is the rhythm, pattern, thing, form of it: no thing and formless. I went them deeply, street, sun, stone, and I am old:
yet that all things evoke you yesterday meant Brooklyn was warm again within the cold.

III I shall now deeply walk as sick among you, ready for all that is my place and love.
 (The dark is mounting and the bells are rung).

I shall go simply and the stars above the cities will be witness that I kissed all of you dying while I died beneath.
 Even as I was praying (thief!) I missed my eyes; someone was snatching at my teeth, and all my life began to fall away.

(My walls my rooms are always catch the play of light against the darkness). Kissed them, for I could not find you and my hands were slashed opening the street the year the sea that tore at us and, bloated plankwood, left us smashed.

IV New Jersey went up like a great smoke in the sky, dusk and all chimney-stacks dragging the nets of day down in the dusts of dark.

Now across bridges spanning what had been meadows of marshes, wilds of grass sagging beneath the wind. I rode, rode in the arc of a sinking day and a sweep of dark among sparks of the beginning stars: I rode stark under sky-dark with my hands all hung between the far-out lights I thought you showed from streets of houses, roadway roundings, bars.

Ride, ride: earth and the night lie long beneath us (ride!), between, darkly the song of land, and passing I rode), and the high stars.

22

V I touch these stars knowing their light is yours, this cold your cold, this night darkly your night
somewhere you are now in this far starlight.

Windows to the night and always tours and pilgrimages seeking where you are (while I am nowhere in all everywhere):
today was Dock Street, and the river air raced on the cobbles to some salt-blown bar
all brown with Philadelphia inside, no sun until, through to the wharves' cold tide,
the water glinted hard beyond the piers.

Windows, midnights of windows, as if to reach in night on air through stars across to each other, dark on the darkness steeped in tiers.

Herbert Morris

SONG

If prink a pose that never goes Beyond the calyx of a rose
Or pierce a sky to find a high
As soft as can a butterfly
Or turn a scale to drop a tale
As deep as down the demon whale
Must halt before the world explodes
In alternating veins and nodes
And clap a different patty cake
When wide awake

Baxter Hathaway

SNOW HERON

unstrings the bough of dew mute

 watching the cool pretense of dawn opening its rind
the snow heron stands with a lilac thought,

 scaled claws caught round the bough
descends this tremulous thigh seeking the curving leap of trout along the sinal wave

 undeciphered
as a dream, the anonymous desire the wind ruffles the hollow feathers of its throat,

 pale the diminishing moon drained of desire drowned in light.

Chris Bjerknes

RECOLLECTIONS OF . . .

I Beard

When I was a boy our neighbor had a beard.
 (Today our neighbor has no face but changes now from year to year, although he always owns his place.)

Slight are the things I used to own:
 a seashell and a leaden lamb.
 They can live in the world alone;
 they are not lost in it. I am.

II White Nights

Each night, or every other night, there rises from the dead
 some familiar feature:
 some head or half a head.

Blue eyes or brown eyes,
 fluttering like birds;
 lips romantic worms have sucked,
 and words, words, words.

In the night and all night in clouds of white unsleep their hands move, their lips move, their brown or blue eyes weep.

III Servants

The cook has married the milkman;
the milkman loves the cook.
In a row the servants stand like cut-outs from a book.

Gertie, Flossie, Awa:
my nurses in a row.
And many a darker flower gone where dark flowers go.

The cook has married the milkman
and not the King of Sweden.
They honeymooned in Kirkwood
instead of honeyed Eden.

IV Never Owned

Her curls were like the little dog
I never owned and always chains hung down the narrowness of neck and her cheek showed thin blue veins.

She made herself into a thing beyond my eyes to brush or reach:
vanilla skin, a thin gold ring and the soft warm juices of a peach.

Herman Salinger

THE RIDER

And look, along the green bank of a stream,
 Under the wind- and light-refracting trees,
 A black horse is running through sun and shade;
 The rider bends forward, loose is the rein;
 They go as one through random breaking waves
 Of earth and air, light, molecules and leaves.

He is not guiding—only that now and then,
 Watching his time, responsive to the need
 (As through this network and determined chain Of blind force we master the will intercedes)
 He leans into the wind and twists the rein
 Ever so slightly, relaxing it again.

See, he depends on the stable form of things
 To hold the intervals entelechy leaves:—
 The beautiful beast along the winding stream,
 The plummeting hooves, the dark flanks quivering:—
 Through whirls of earth and air, the gold and green,
 Perceptive spirit rides with loosened rein.

Charles G. Bell

NEGATIVE RESURRECTION

Blind in the night, remembering times of vision,
 From the unseen dark horizon thunder wakes
 Lost images of lightning; flickering streaks
 Of flame reform on the retina's prison
 Empires of brightness, soul's indwelling. Risen
 On the world the god of thunder shakes
 The drowned heart in the leaves. Blindness seeks The fountain of fire, destroying intercession.

Dark. Wind runs in the trees, depicting cloud.
 Sense gropes by shadows, as the sick desire Moves to the storm. Now two shapes gathering fill
 The past and future:—day-spring up torn shrouds
 Of the tomb; and here on the great west hill
 An old man, arms to the lightning, seized by fire.

Charles G. Bell

MOUNTAINTOP, SOLUS

Aloft, the tree finds sky enough to support, it being summer and cloudless. With night coming on and the wind a buttress of sorts, there will be time for earth again,
 and a rest from this posturing.

To drop into one's roots, that's it!— subterranean, washed by seep and lavished by decay. The thrust of long branches sharp into the air excites, but somehow wearies one.
 Here to rest, here now to forget the jealous rustling of the leaves, all envy of altitude, in slumping sleep among the cool rocks.

Frederick Eckman

IT WAS CROWDED IN THE PARK

I called out: You,
 over there by the jaded lilac bush
 Come out, I have something to say to you.
 There is only this yawning moment before I heel down the clipped path out of sight of the lacey bridge and your spurious ease by the lilac bush at the water's edge under the parabolic steel bloom this Sunday, come out.
 I must speak to you, I must get across to you over the loaded span peopled mellifluously, flowing ice cream cones, blowing with balloons bursting with bunches of silence.
 Come out, I must say anything to you.

Mortimer Slaiman

SEVEN GRAINS OF CORN

Later they could talk of it, they, the living,
They could place symbolic grains besides each plate,
Seven hard and uncooked grains each Thanksgiving:
Small and almost lost, their corn, among the great Heaped trays of fruit, of fowl, the yield of planted Ground, or bounteous gift from virgin wood and plain.
Aye, they could feast now, thank God for granted
Favor, but stark beside each plate there lay the grain,
Reminder of the bitter year, of hunger gnawing,
Of seven daily rationed grains, of dead who lay
In common unmarked grave that savages, though drawing Close, might never guess how few remained.

Today

May we place seven grains beside each plate,
Or has it grown too late, oh bitterly too late?

Elizabeth Anderson

OPINION

Walls Of The Labyrinth. By Morris Weisenthal, Denver: Alan Swallow. 48pp. $2.00

This first book is published as a prize in a competition conducted by Alan Swallow, publisher of the New Poetry Series under which project this volume was issued. Many of the poems included have been published before in periodicals here and abroad.

The book adds a new note to a familiar theme, "the contemporary scene. Several of the poems are outstandingly successful. Objective in their fusion of the personal and disciplined, they are a pleasure to read. Their tone is firm, compassionate; strong and capable at the same time of great sensitivity. Individual lines stand out with immense exaltation, reminding this reader of Hart Crane. The newness that Mr. Weisenthal adds to his subject is in his attitude. He has his spirit, his tradition. They remain firm. The Bible, particularly the Old Testament, appears to be the foundation of his thought. He has read the moderns, and is definitely influenced by them, but his direction is from the Old Testament, expressed either by statement or implication. In a poet of Mr. Weisenthal's sophistication and reading, this is what strikes one as new. The existentialist despair today does not touch him. Bitter and self accusatory by turns, the hope and encouragement that one is able to take away springs from the very strength of his indignation.

Breakwater: Atlantic City

The beast hurtles its tides, wastes its strength
 On our cunning—rushes, subsides
 Into the vastness of its amphitheatre,
 White horns trailing from the cape
 And ears taunted with peanut shells and laughter.

At war time—the time dead sons fell heavily
 On their mothers—I soldiered here.
 At this elegant absurd resort
 Where buxom charities kissed the potential corpse,
 Hourly I heard vengeance
 Knock on this shore; here my innocence drowned,
 In no ritual but the abyss of law.
 Beast of no form, of no sleep,
 lolling gigantically or maned in battering spume—
 Roar in our remorseless ears,
 Eat our frauds, wrestle and throw our dreadnaughts;
 Corrode our vanities.

There are mistakes in the book here and there: a too great condensation of material; overuse of ellipses; lapses in diction; endings weak or abrupt in meaning; echoes of remembered reading. The accomplishment for that reason should be the more emphasized. Modern verse techniques were formed to demolish the smug, degenerated religious tone of the 19th Century. Mr. Weisenthal employs these same techniques to re-introduce a re-invigorated faith. At least four poems in this short book are successful in this attempt: Tiresias, Absorbed in the World's Will, Chorus, and Descent. These may herald the start of a fundamental re-examination among us. We have felt it stirring restlessly for some time. In that light, Mr. Weisenthal's book is a serious and distinguished contribution.

D.I.