

THE BELOIT POETRY JOURNAL
Volume 8 - Number 3 Spring 1958

CONTENTS

- | | |
|--------------------------|--|
| 1 SY KAHN | A Song for David, My Son |
| 2 JAMES BOYER MAY | Two Poems |
| 4 HOLLIS SUMMERS | Knock, and It Shall Be Opened |
| 5 JAMES LAND JONES | Portrait |
| 6 WILLIAM STAFFORD | Four Poems |
| 8 ELIZABETH BARTLETT | The Eagles |
| 10 DAVID GALLER | The Anniversary |
| 12 MILLEN BRAND | Anger |
| 15 GEORGE STARBUCK | Cora Punctuated With Strawberries |
| 16 EDNA K. MEUDT | To Journey Alone |
| 18 MARVIN SOLOMON | The Mantis Man |
| 20 SHEILA PRITCHARD | The Impossible Mountain |
| 28 ALBERT HOWARD CARTER | Ode on S. Nicholas's Day |
| 29 EDSSEL FORD | My Aunt Tells a Story |
| 31 RAMON GUTHRIE | Two Poems |
| 35 HENRY BIRNBAUM | The Beanstalk |
| 39 CELESTE TURNER WRIGHT | Yugoslav Cemetery |

THE BELOIT POETRY JOURNAL
Volume 8 - Number 3 Spring 1958

A SONG FOR DAVID, MY SON

With hands that trellis air David plays a harp of sunstrings.
His luminous eyes
Read notes in dustmotes;
His delicate hair revolves
The light in soft volutes.

What ancient song,
What Israel lament
That whispered soft
From Saul's great tent
Flutes to his delicate ear?

In this pale shell
The blood still sings—
So far from sandy shore Where Moses struck—
New testimony
To the old sweet moan.

Hard against his chest my ear
Can hear only the throb
Of my own heart, or its young echo, While David hears the song
That I have lost,
And translates in the yellowed air—
The color of old manuscript—
The trembling song
From age to age.

Sy Kahn

TWO POEMS

Post-Mortem Freedom Song

(For poets who could not ignore)

With "underground" one's most precise definement of one's rabbitwise condition—presently or late—how may one lift one's squeal in greatphrased liltings, visioning such dark?

Suffectly scurry rhyming-park beside stern-metred graveyard walls, and even flourish banners, palls to wrap spelled selves against "red" soil when leaping optionally (mind—moilsharp instrument again—no lance) which warren each may chased-there chance.

Ah, happy furless fish, we sing while water fills these holes to bring scanned foot-leap. Accent's bullets passed, no metaphor's equivo-cast!

Not merely dampened, speedy-drowned . . .
 and every ingress aptly found holds assurément what we'd all this time unvaguely feared: our call to final anonymity—our seepage-prospect, unity with loam, enriched therewith by our unwitting carcasses, to flower into another spring upon bright graves, within which we anon lie not. We “safely” found which we preferred, and dove to bliss quite free.

And who can argue now? No stone is carven telling who'll atone because we didn't leap that wall and chisel boldly, disregarding all.

James Boyer May

The Abstract, Briefly Defended

A quibble could—and nicely, by some nicely-nasty juggled worddefinements—so enwrap abstract in gauzed semantic fluffiness, that pages might be inky-spit-ted eye-destroyers. But the word the critics use is plainly vague by comprehension—taking off from rocky, red-hot spires to neutral atmosphere, there hung in space, condemned because intangible, they cry.

Now, wait! They say they see it soaring, feel its gassy draft . . .
and even angered by its hue, they charge it's unspecific, when it calls to mind all difference amongst the buyers of escape.
Now, could it be the user had in mind the same result? That word comprising most meant best to him?

 And do objectivists surpass the inward-dreamers conjuring without such color-taste-and-sound exactitudes? And must the last and only meaning always be the shaft-sharp one mot juste? Or may not tolerance concede both mul-tiplex intentions and some joy to those quick-bored by easy arrows?

James Boyer May

KNOCK, AND IT SHALL BE OPENED

When I went south the northbound cars, driven By appearing men of faith who knew the worth Of north, asked one question over and over,
 "Wishing which wish?"

I was blessed With time, knowing that those who asked were given,
 Those who sought, found.

I headed north.
 Which? Which wish?

I tried the east.
 A lover
 Of absolute directions, I drove west.

I am afraid it is rather late to switch To diagonal routes,
 wishing which wish,
 which wish wishing.

Hollis Summers

PORTRAIT: A CONTEMPORARY

When mothers at last grown weary with cancer, die, They bequeath to their sons prosecution of letters, written

From college (Love, Son). Collecting in layers that lie Like griefs heavy pressured, the notes beside them, chill

With circumscribed words, ridicule her will.

When you, a friend, wander dumbly into drawers Alone at night, these will remain intractable
By previous definition, held exterior.
Your fingers will fumble desperately for a fault In stratification so infractable.

After selling the house (the father hotels) and he moves

To apartmented transience, continuing beyond graduation

In this school, awaiting the Army Or some worthwhile thing to do, it behooves
You to deplore his improbable sense of direction.

When unpaid bills and reminders of classes cut Litter the desk top like shavings, you'll listen To her recordings, among her furniture, moved,
And later at three descend in silence the stair
To the burner, with beer cans in a collection.

When stumbling on insecurity he will be caught Between the sexes, you will love him piteously well.
Should you read someday of his death in the war In Hungary, it will explain perhaps the fought Imponderable thing that was hidden in his mother's will.

James Land Jones

FOUR POEMSTotem

Some kind of swirl—and I was born,

Confederates among the animals catching my loss in scales or fins and starting with it up the path again;

A Jericho whistle through early mist—my cousins were talking with the other quail, hunting the perfect hedge to call.

In a pasture minute of any day
I will go like the drop of rain on a thorn.
Some animal will touch a paw with its tongue,
Some kind of swirl—and again I'll be born.

A Hudson River Vista

A pride of Mohawks, their scalps all whiskied, leaped at their hour, dawn-light, to the carving.
By noon the farms were smoke.

No use to call this evil, nor yet fate:
a certain forest the Colonies tormented matured and brought forth fruit.

Men on the Hudson, I have watched your rings flash good and evil on the train to work, and heard your papers rustling.

Each dawn the headlines whisper Mohawk names.

Long Distance

Sometimes when you watch the fire ashes glow and gray the way the sun turned cold on spires in winter in the town back home so far away.

Sometimes on the telephone the one you hear goes far and ghostly voices whisper in.
You think they are from other wires.
You think they are.

Deer Stolen

Deer have stood around our house at night so still nobody knew, and waited with ears baling air.
I hunt the still deer everywhere.

For what they heard and took away, stepping through the chaparral, was the sound of Then; now it's Now, and those small deer far in the wild

Are whispers of our former life.
The last print of some small deer's foot might hold the way, might be a start that means in ways beyond our ken

Important things. I follow them through all the hush of long ago to listen for what small deer know.

William Stafford

THE EAGLES

Came the first, a great eagle with great wings, Long wings streaked with colors and wide to wind, Soaring, coasting, spiralling height of sky,
And exulting in his swift, fearless flight.
A lone contender of the sun, without Equal or rival, he screamed his proud Defiance at the earth beneath his feet, Then horizoned out to the highest peak
And placed his nest among the stars, a king.

His might unchallenged, he cropped off the top Of the tallest twig and carried it down To a land of traffic, where it would be A symbol among the lower and the weak Of his great power, pledging to protect Them with his wings, to comfort and defend All within reach of his talon and beak,
His rule their only hope and guarantee Against fellow creatures, their enemies.

Then boldly he took the most promising seed
And had it planted in a fertile field Where it grew and became a worthy wood Whose branches turned toward him because their roots

Were under him—and the eagle's shadow
Was part of the trees, as gentle shadows Gave way to struggling shoots and ambitious Boughs, until they spread so thick, so lush,
And there were so many more birds to clutch

That a second great eagle with great wings Appeared, with lust as strong and vision keen
As he who had fulfilled his dream too well.

And now the trees swayed, the branches trembled,
The woods shook as in a storm, birds and leaves Fluttered in the darkening wake of siege, While the roots twisted and turned, threatening To rise and split the ground in two, if these,
Their masters, could not covenant a peace.

Long the eagles circled, pondering each
His own intentions and weighing his speed Against the other's force, to make assault Swift and sure and secure a victor's score;
But twinned as they were in fierceness and design,
The two took secret council: to unite Their likenesses, that together they might Set the land at ease and between them bind Its blessings by this oath that both despised.

With banners raised, calmly their shadows merged
And they returned, brothers by blood and word To all the small and humble birds they shared For the common good. And now the roots veered Their branches to the new allegiance, made The soil drink from new streams, so that they gave More and better fruit than ever before,
And the woods prospered in having two lords Who sheathed their claws with cautious greed and scorn.

Slowly they moved apart, making their truce Extend as far as they could spy and swoop
On the first mouse to cross and scout the field In the belly of a snake, sign and seal Of eagle's war. When it came, both flew up, Poised for the strike, the bloody kill, the skull Of hated adversary—but neither one

Came down. Caught by invisible nets, they plunged Into their own snares with their hearts unstrung.

Then the fowls of the heavens and the beasts Of the earth gathered. What ruins were these From which there was no deliverance or escape?
And they went out and scattered the remains Toward all the winds, until the eagles' dust Had drifted and settled, bringing green shrubs
To the desert, tall cedars to the hills, Young meadows into clearings and a finch To sing of other summers coming in.

Elizabeth Bartlett

THE ANNIVERSARY

It was five years ago tonight, she thought, Standing outside the house that she had kept In order since the death, that on that hill
I rose furious and fell sobbing, and heard The bleating of a goat my virtuous grief Had not kept from danger, that some demon Had seen fit to hinder on my husband's hill,
That when I stared in the deep trench I thought

The poor beast dead, but it has been my grief Since, limping to my hand, and what I've kept Is more than goat-friend, or my husband's demon-Passion to help all whose faint cries he'd heard,

And five years ago tonight came the demon
Who I thought then could not have known my grief, Who so tended the goat, who may have heard Some sign of my impatience, filled the hill
My husband loved so with sorrow for beast kept Instead of shot, that then I had but one thought

Which was to voice in a harsh tone my grief,
And even before I, he on the hill Seemed to know that grief was not my demon, No, not of that kind, husband- or goat-thought,
So much as wonder, after all he'd heard, Over how long the lie of love I'd kept

I'd kept as love itself, and what he heard
He was discreet about, even as a demon Playing cat and mouse, by silence kept,
Until the goat's bleating stopped and grief Turned to embarrassment in every thought,
And then, he stood facing me on the hill,

Telling me how a husband's friend had kept Faith with the departed and all he'd heard About his widow's beauty, whose main thought Was needing a man to tend the goats, with demon-Skill proving where we stood upon that hill
How well he knew my each way and true grief

Of all those hard-kept years, and on that hill
I heard rasp and sigh left me no room for grief Or thought whether he was god, man, or demon . . .

David Galler

ANGER

Reifsnyder at seventy-three still liked to cut up a slaughtered pig.
He had the knife sharp, and on a slope where the land opened below the barn he hung the carcass up in its shroud fresh from the boiling water, and on the belly he cut a thin red line. The dogs, though hungry, backed away, knowing he would kick them, but waited. They would get fed.
The men sat near, on the ground.
They watched this man chew his straw, wink, and revolve the knife in his hand.

He steadied the heavy carcass supported on the gallows wire by the feet tendons in the hesaholtz and there it hung, a corpse, white—that dead-white look. Like others he had had an only son.
A son means all to a farmer,
the fist of his life—his hope.
The farm boundaries licked across the neighbors' for this one son to inherit.
The house was built large for him.
Now that the son was dead, life, that schwowa, went on,
and one said nothing—nothing.
There was one Bowman, in Bally, talked about a dead son—all right for him, not for me.
Reifsnyder's son married a woman a little older than he.
Had looks, yes. Brought money too.
Everything seemed as it should be.

They lived in Reifsnnyder's house as it had long been planned, but the woman, from the first night on, kept to her side of the bed—so the son told it—was silent, then went home to her folks.
Maybe what it was she needed was a house of her own.
They arranged another house, but, no, she would not—and would not talk.
Then my son going to his room, staying by himself— The knife worked down.
The inward parts began to be exposed:
liver, heart, kidneys, lungs.
There is something dreamlike in the colors of these organs.
Inward where all is protected, where all floats in liquid, there are colors unknown to the air—and vivid—reds, veiolich, hot lamps of grays and browns—like dreams that, when colored at all, are startling in their vividness.
He raised the bucket to these parts and scraped all down.
To hang himself. To hang himself for a woman. What is a woman?
Die Welt steht, what is a woman to die for? He spat out the straw, and continued to chew it in his mind.
Fool, what is it, what is it?
The next one is just as good.
We arranged for the other house.
We divided the beds, the bedclothes, so they would go and then come back later when your mother and I died, later when the house was yours.

I put my pride down. What is it?
What is that stubborn sehnsucht
I could not unstick from your eyes?
Speak, you fool. Oh, fool, fool.
He had the bladder now in his hand, the leathery sac like a balloon, hot with the living urine.
To die. In a rage he squeezed it.
He pissed it out over the ground in the pale, steaming stream out of its natural organ.
Then he threw the sac and its attachments to the dogs.

 The carcass was empty.
All that remained was to split it, and one man would carry half away and another man the other half.
So nothing changed? Would he always hate his son as he did now, keeping his son alive in himself, or would he at the end of his life let his son die at last, fixing a reasonable line around his farm and his hurt, and, so, get ease at last?

Millen Brand

CORA PUNCTUATED WITH STRAWBERRIES

Sandra and that boy that's going to get her in trouble one of these days were out in the garden where anyone in Mother's sickroom could see them out the upperleft corner of the window sitting behind the garage feeding each other blueberries and Cherry was helping with the dishes alone in the kitchen and um good strawberries if we did grow them just can't can without popping one in every so often Henry was at it again in the attic with that whatchamacallit of his when the Big Bomb fell smack in the MacDonalds' yard you know over on Elm and they got into Life and the papers and all all very well but they might have been home when it hit and it would have been a very different story for Lucy MacDonald then I'll tell you you know they say it was right in the Geographic Center of the country the Geographic woody Center and you could hear it over here plain as day I thought the elevator had blown up and I guess you read yourself the awful things it would have done
aak you know there's an awful lot of woody strawberries this year they say they only had the one and only would have needed one well

I always knew we could beat the enemy they made such shoddy tricks and spring-toys and puzzles and fuses and things and besides, it wouldn't have been right.

George Starbuck

TO JOURNEY ALONE

Beloved, somewhere in this city a Norseman has hung his cowbell.
I touch you in starless night and in the preludes to days, the piercing fragments of an accent, gorse-gold haze over the hills of far away.

Mine were the calcite hands that set you free in midnight sunlight above the paths of water-pearl.

A wind sifted you through the outspread day to lie upon the iron mountains of Helgeland, adrift to fishing islands for time immemorial.
Was it this wind or another that urged you to venture from the cove which cuts this coast of low-ledged granite;
then moaned through our years for your return?

Marrow-deep I live your longing now.

Strangers shared moonfire warming a sky
robed in eyelet over orange.
It ceramiced the sea and all night we flew with it westward to the city where you were bondman.

Over the Sound with a sherbet sunrise melting it was beneath us like a clutch of cricket baskets poised on a finger of land.

"The wicker works ensnares a pantherama," you whispered once in a deaf one's ear,
"and engined mammoths churn this channel round a Jurassic jungle."

I would go, beloved, fatigue-faint to the ghosthold of our home . . .
Pterodactyl-planes were cruising, the saurian subway stirred . . .
I tarried an endless time and was poured from a fishbowl bus into the salmon-run of commuter's rush.

Still you stood afar, a tympanum-ringing echo:
"The giant held a banana-moon and stars of lemon-drop."

The lidless eyes of lighted rooms and sliding serpent signs defaced the cashmere cape that twilight draped upon the avenues . . .

There was one resembling you in the gray dust of laughter dancing in the distances of his look—A seldom-spoken man and softly then.
He heard a cricket chirp above the human-motor current.

"Unless we see," another said . . .
Beneath a scaffold some tiles were moved and insects fled their tunneled shelter.

"Man hears what he listens for."

He proved it so, as from his pocket he brought forth a handful of change and flung it like wheat to hens; hearing the clink of the coins rushing pedestrians paused.

O my dearest above the city on the flume of evening that moon was a tilted canoe—spilled over me its memory-cargo of you.
The sudden infinity thawing rolled wet from my face.

Edna K. Meudt

THE MANTIS MAN

"Look (gasp), from the flying saucer—can It be, it is, it's Mantis Man!
Right at our door like a fantastic address, He's eating an old lady like a Delicious Apple; and in tow he's got Sharon,
And Marilyn Blumberg, and the annoying man Who gabbed all the way downtown on the bus.
Call the Baltimore Sun, and say suburbia's Been invaded from outer space; call the police,

Say the Mantis Man's devouring the Jews;
 Call the governor, call out the militia—Flamethrowers, grenades, and DDT
 For the most bloodthirsty, most horrific, Most phantasmagoric, most anti-Semitic,
 Most anti-human creature of the imagination,
 The twenty-foot, orthopterous Mantis Man!"
 (End of scenario, end of scene!)

(Fade in Ed Murrow and tele-hum!)

"Out of a poster sky it came, as come It would the scientists said who did not believe in flame

Or ice but in a kind of superlice
 That would eat us out of time and place.
 It, in the ungrammar of Armageddon, Arrived precisely at 6:30 PM, DST, on a windless evening in chilly streets,
 As Pop came home to the wife and kids.
 For supper that night, for October sunset,
 For cigarette, book, and TV—"It".
 Out of Pollock hazards of orbital dust,
 It motivated its jet-propulsed Spacetta, green arms revered to its zeroed Job: take earth, take man, take thought.
 Incidental means to a thumping success Reached denouement in a Baltimore house."
 (Fade voice, fade sound, fade Marvin S.!)

Marvin Solomon

THE IMPOSSIBLE MOUNTAIN

At verge of the pink woods silvered by slender poplars I lay me down to hide amidst the fine green cones lay me down on the warm earth crushing the long green grasses earth-crust pushing and cracked with fears.

Small fall breezes, warm as the summer, warn of the winter behind the pass at verge of the pink wood, edge of the mountain, the most impossible mountain ever heard.

 The mountain round and high and blue lipped with humbled clouds broken their prophet's veil, and torn by towering winds of ice.

The breezes scent it, slither and shake the beneficent hum of elms, to strum down, down down our living down to the probable earth—from up from high the impossible mountain mistress to sun alone, and yet Who knows—who is master up on the sterile cliff?

I lay on the warm earth, crushing the grasses, nibbling a fine green cone at verge of the pink wood, after the marshes, drying and soaking the sun's warm lashes, watching the tamarack's gold spined filigree tremble a queenly tread through lazing sunlight and folding breezes tainted with chill from the most improbable impossible merge at the edge of the wood.

At twilight the night feeding deer came out from the sheltering swamp to feed, to lick crystals of stream and sea, long dead, the essence of being, dried, and spread in filtered cones of old root beds. They nibbled sprouts of spruce and oak, and never felt my shallowed breath nor stamped my presence on the ground, but fed leisurely, as though no enemy watched them overhead.

And more and more uneasy as I lay, hidden, hiding, wishing the woods away, the cones bittered, the grasses bit, forgotten images flitted. Cedars creaked and acorns hit me across the cheek.

The deer lapped daintily, almost safe at the open salt lick their fathers found:
enlarging Epicycle of need, a region of pure desire, the ground humped and bent with old repressions.

The trees grew under the Old Wolf Tree—old wolf, old Man with his high, wide spread haunching over the small sparse pines, sparing the sunlight as he would,

each conserving each, and none to spare—

And where is the open sacrifice?

When old Abraham marched to the mountain to appease the possible wrath the incredibly tall wall, and whatever reared beyond, just any holocaust wouldn't have done:

He came through the pink wood past the ghost fox's double den where acorns fatten and fall and burst to fill the black squirrel's cheeks with never a glance he climbed with Isaac, his only son, and the does looked, cautious, sated with salt, curious, and watched him halt at the driest timbers to bind the likeliest bud subject to fears, insect desires, human derivatives and divinations, subject to passion and, of all things, tenderness

And would not any God at this blue flaming prospect jealous but welcoming, adoring and welcoming,
 at least, corrupt him?

Abraham slid Isaac over the green cones bitterness rising oil of the unripe seed as much a salve as rarest unguent poured to heal, perhaps, the mountain's massive steeped sterility.

Then incendiary birds flew out of the thicket their sparks unbound the boy and do you remember, a ram innocently by, sufficed?

And somewhere the land of the conquerors, spell binders. There, only the blind (desperate) lovers leap Archeologists finding a skull mark well the box which held a jewel.

Or North where the giant oak dangling with mistletoe pearling in strange fecundity squared into frames of flame filled with living reference raised a rash of anguish: Let me climb the oak wear the holy parasite and burn with blessing.
Didn't the sun shine benign, the very next day, Didn't he?

Our sons and daughters
We walked them through fire diverting enchantments
the bruised reed become serpent,
. . . the honey bee hid . . .
to deliver to hands of despoilers

a time cast out of sight

Taste, savor well this wisdom born in water welling over the salt sea.
Deer, stricken by instinct, find their answer far from shores, in the sandy static brink of a wave.

On blotting paper lies the backward answer answer before ever the question never the voice of experience never bearded advice just the simple answer backward

Carry the mirror to the blotter
there is no life in the mirror there is no life in the answer A moving finger wrote, the pen flowed once, and nevermore again.

Could one properly begin with questioning, before he wrote, before the ink flowed backward into the simple answer, but it is always too late.

If it were always as easy as a one times one, and one the answer (That terrible zero times one do you remember that answer?)

There are those who force a sort of peace,

a status quo,
and under huge meticulous mantles nervously check their wrists for time.

Time?

I look and watch for slightest sign the ineffable moment . . .
none, none to be done with,
never over

(Halls to the Sun still stand, hand carved, and the mistletoe hung.)

And the blue rim of the mountain strung horizoned sized to my lying-down eyes.

There is time
there is time
while white grapes turn ruddy and heady for yeast asleep ferment and bubble, sour skin and a seasoned recipe yet unlearned
there is time

while acorns round and plump their caps to clump on the needled ground (nobody wants to share)
there is time

with many a den all cosied, set, safely deep for storm and chill granary, crib, complete with traps poker faces and transient will
there is time

Just over the hill I could hide Sand easy to burrow.
The land turtle lumbers by furling tracks
he'll not use again

Sun finds easily every grain of salt, can melt, globule a rock to vault.
 Turtle, I could beg your back, those layering years.

All the wisdom that the pack of deer contain contains no resurrection theory I can use, or ant, bee, thimbleberry!

What I lack surfeits me, suffused with its use undone, abused,
stung to ivy rancid taint to taunt me

There is time
is time

There is not time
There never was The immediate perceptible precipice looms eternal, obedient too to whom?

Down through the hungering years by disabled springs and the choked creek in rude violation of sound, I come the birds ominously dumb, and all the fairest chosen

At verge of the pink wood, under the oak and under the wintering pine when March fawns prance in innocence only the perfect surviving what can I find to offer? I desperately proffer it all deciding this time, pursuing time, poor Abraham at best,
it's got to be what I want as much,
It has to be enough

Or it might not set
the impossible mountain
at rest.

Sheila Pritchard

ODE ON S. NICHOLAS'S DAY

Tantus amor florum et generandi gloria mellis.

Verg. Geo. lib. 4

ReJoyce in the Pound

Come Parsons,
 Come Leonard the Lyons, Spectator and Tatler, Come Winchell:
 O tell,
 Inspire my praise of the Statler Hotel.

In the land of the cod, the steak, or the rattler, Behold! a multitude of heavenly hostels, the Statler.
 Sunt gemini portae, upstairs and down,
 One of auto horn, one on the town.
 Both lead to the antiseptic hostile tower:
 Lasciat' ogni personality on entering this bower
 Of bliss, where no birds sing Nor breezes stir, nor curfews ring
 The Nell, nor fire to cover of coal or passion.
 Here's to love, that is, of fashion!

Hail the service, hail the ever-flowing fount!
 Hail the escalator, hail th'expense account!
 The wishing well runneth over:
 Put on the dog, put out the Rover
 By gemini porters—they all look the same—And servitors are servidors,
 And Harry's not the Bailey's name, Though there's esprit with accent on the corps,
 And none is any man's fool,
 For tips give more than teaching school.

Hail the lacquered hair, the mink, the stole!

Hail the sanitizèd toilet bowl!

Buffer against the revolt of Ortega y Gasset
The sterile toilet seat at bottom's an asset.

All is calm, all is clean

Alf Laylah wa Laylah

Ou la la wei allala

Everyman's an auspicious king, every woman a quean.

Efficiency's your hobby:

You wear your hearth on your lobby.

Hail the regal scuttling claws!

Who dares to beat a pitch?

Hail the bonded Santa Claus

With tolerable neural itch!

Hail the guilt-edged bond!

Hail the platinum, ave the blonde!

Welcome the fisher, the mixer, the cattler:

Serve them all with Ifrit and Jinn,

But tell, O tell us, Hotel Statler,

Is there room in the Inn?

Albert Howard Carter

MY AUNT TELLS A STORY

My aunt tells a story word of mouth; therefore she wouldn't approve of my doing it this way.

At any given time, she would prefer a small, select audience; thus I deny her.

In 1935 she was raising cotton; some would say she raised a bit of Cain. My chore is to tell about the Cain, but the cotton is a necessary prop, if I've not forgotten.

And I haven't. She had forty acres of the stuff. She ploughed it by herself. If that wasn't enough, she chopped it alone and pulled out the Johnson grass with her own hands. Forty acres, mind you.

Then one day as she chopped and pulled, a voice said Catherine, Catherine, there is someone behind you.

And she turned calmly and there in a mass of sumac was a man, a man of all men choice.

My aunt, who I see I have neglected to say was not until shortly thereafter my aunt at all, dropped her hoe and went over to the grove and spoke to this man. It was a hot day;

she didn't mind that he was naked. He was tall and sunburned and he wanted to make love. Which my aunt said it was too hot for, but if he'd help her for a while and put on his clothes, he could go home with her that night and she'd see he got fed and after that, who knows? So this sort of thing went on the rest of the year, it being so agreeable to both;

and the next spring my aunt planted another field in cotton, an idea to which my uncle was loath, because by this time Aunt Catherine got a fear she might be pregnant. It couldn't be helped nor healed.

She surely was. Pregnant as the devil. My common-law uncle departed for all points west. My aunt's eyes wear a veil to ward off evil, but of all my cousins, I like her bastard best.

Edsel Ford

TWO POEMS

Billy and the Once-Upon: A Cosmogony

Once upon a chance a technician in charge of the giant telescope atop Mount Murgatroyd profiting by the momentary inattention of his employer filched an infinitesimal fragment of fossilized light shed by a long so many light-years dead star and took it home for his infant son to play with.

Once upon a beach four virgin sirens watched a racoon playing in the moonlight.
Once upon a time-beam an improbable angel twanged to its surprise a mating call that brought all the porpoises for meridians around turning phosphorescent flip-flops out of the brittle sea. The shattering panes of brine set up vibrations in the cradle which in turn crystallized the stolen light into a spar of purest tourmaline. The infant howled:
The racoon paused in its play and scurried for cover:
the virgin sirens uttered embarrassed titters and screened their pudicities with tremulous fingers:
a walrus raised its mustached head and roared:
the angel hurriedly unstrung the time-beam and smuggled it into its brassière:
all science was discarded and had to be re-invented by nine old nunces mumbling night and day for as many nautical years: the porpoises interrupted their cartwheels and trooped sheepishly back to the sea casting abashed glances over their shoulders at the still virgin sirens. The thievish technician was canonized: the baby grew up to be illegitimate, and the innocent cause of it all, the gigantic telescope atop Mount Murgatroyd, revealed to be a phallic symbol, was banned from polite conversation forever and ever and a long drear winter's day.

Fragment of a Travelog

The day I left Arizona it was 126 in the if-there-had-been shade Which, speaking of hot climates, brings me —with fifteen years interim—to North Africa, specifically Algiers and Algiers, as far as I'm concerned, Sidi Benny Bouffetout can have.

Tunis is all right in a Tunisian sort of way and I always meant to get to Marrakech, but Algiers, unless you chance to like siroccos and bougainvilleas . . .

Yet, wait, there was that girl, the waitress at our mess—Li'l Booful, known for short as the Hydrophobia Doll
 for how she had us frothing at the mouth—and it wasn't just that in those days Algiers had fewer girls per male than there are horned toads in the State of Maine—oh no! that girl-chile was set up with so much of the most of everything that the morning she came to work in a fluffy pink sweater the young adjutant dropped a cup of scalding coffee in his lap and it might as well have been frostbite . . .

Everything—and when she found herself a pair of nylons instead of cotton ones she had been wearing, a little more than everything

AND

those

Great Big Innocent

(Oh, hombre, were they Innocent!)

EYES

thrown in.

And when she moved about between the tables all that

Everything about her bounced:

It was like early Spring fresh from the Fôret de Chantilly coming around a corner at full tilt with its arms full of daffodils.

And when she leaned over your shoulder to put more butter on the table or replace an empty ketchup bottle, minutes later you found yourself still trying to eat with the wrong end of your fork.

The mess fund piled up profits all that month with most of us too ogle-eyed to eat.

Until one day a visiting one-star general took in the situation at one glance and Li'l Booful at another and the next we heard she was up at Caserta in a sort of WAC uniform as his non-typing, non-English-speaking secretary.

Also there was the day when all the Viennese 6 foot 4 of Baron von Raubitz, knees crouched up to his ears like an overgrown grasshopper behind the wheel of the jeep ("In Vienna Mercedes, Isotta, Daimler have I owned") insisted on driving it and crashed into a British staff car.
The British sergeant got out and said respectfully,

"Sir, may I see your particulars?"
"My what?" says Raubitz. "What does he want to see?"

"Your particulars," I translated and climbed out of the jeep and walked away.

I never saw him again either but missed him much less than Li'l Booful, Our Hydrophobia Doll.

No, on the whole Algiers could have been worse.

Ramon Guthrie

and fear hides its voice in the woods large or small.

And she wrapped her shawl about her fear

warning trees and sent him out in trade shadowed by a milk-white cow among the trees reaching higher than clouds up out of darkness trembling tops through the woods with wonder small or large and a voice seeking courage and a dotted fawn.

Till he met a man

wrinkled whose face was round and wise whose eyes were easy who said there is no city but thickness like stone harder than night and heavy and the man was round and mild.

He said you cannot buy courage nor trade it for wonder and loved the milk-white cow patience and slow.

He said here is magic for love and a heart taller than trees and I take the cow for its milk-white experience.

from one bag to the next counting with thick fingers and large.

Then in the drowsy clouds snored like a thick bag a heavy wind thick with counting the boy tip

toeing on the trembling tops with golden wonder and small his voice quiet with courage.

And the giant woke smelling

the blood of the world thick with counting and anger running where the boy was wrapped fear

fear like a brooding growth excited the chase enveloping love lost among trembling tops descending into the world suspicion cutting the stalk higher once than clouds

somewhere a giant licking his shadow and below down down lower surrounded by fears large or small.

She wrapped him in pride and counted their money scheming the notions of the happy world where the voice was courage and the stone was thick and cold.

She said O there are places for little boys large in wonder but who will go to the city trade on fear escape the dark who will buy wisdom trembling woods and hold the screams in a bag.
 Yet he was small smaller than wonder.

Henry Birnbaum

YUGOSLAV CEMETERY Jackson, California

At Gettysburg full anonymity:
 Number for him whose name is past recall;
 The marker dwindles, and the turf appears Scant for a soldier's wear. (Can this be all?)

But here each granite bears a photograph:
 From window-frame a personality, Miniature of wraith, is gazing out,
 Rain on the cheek in wistful parody.

Slavic inscription cannot hide this pair, Wholly themselves, too young for such a bed;
 Miner who died of silicosis; wife Thin-faced and dark, with braids about her head.

Quietly as their neighbors they persist,
 Preserve their essence, hint their special pain;
 We are intruding on their privacy,
 These large-eyed mournful lovers in the rain.

Celeste Turner Wright