

CONTENTS

		PAGE
Brooks Haxton	One Drop Spilled From Psyche's Lamp	5
Brian Hubbell	Mail Order Stomp	6
	Measuring E. B. White's Boathouse	10
Jennifer Craig Pixley	A Tendency Toward Order	12
	Site Specific	14
	Love Song	15
Frank Conaway	The Water Bearer	16
Alice B. Fogel	Grassfire	17
Theodore Deppe	Set Design for the City	18
Tenaya Darlington	Sea Braids	20
Hillel Schwartz	Mount St. Peter, Maastricht	22
	Rancho Coastal Humane Society
	Thrift Shop Sutra	24
Kenneth Rosen	Equinox	26
Alice Friman	A Walk at the End of the Century	28
S. Banks-Richardson	Before I Became Like Everyone Else . . .
	and Then Decided to Stop	29
E. M. Schorb	Sharp	30
J. Cordary	I Want	34
	The Catfish Song	34
	Daffodil	35
Janice Soderling	Another White Cloud of Moths	36
Ryland Bruhwiler	Today I Wasted My Life	37
James Mersmann	Lighting the Lamp	38
	Watching My Mother's Breath	40
Ann Keniston	Immunity	42
Carrie Etter	After the Attack	43
Books in Brief
	Heather McHugh, Broken English: Poetry and Partiality and
	Hinge & Sign	44

ONE DROP SPILLED FROM PSYCHE'S LAMP

Your throat
by dawnish windowlight, the purple bloodwell throbbing in your sleep toward hidden thought, these eighteen years since dawn first showed me in your sleep
how beautiful you are,
again I see, and turn away, these few years being my young manhood, gone.

I hate and love,
a young man cried, great Latin guttering in his blood,
and if you ask me how,
he said, or why,
what I can tell you is I feel it burn.

Brooks Haxton

Two Poems

MAIL ORDER STOMP

The values that determine human behavior are vastly more complex and varied than they were when the concept [of Economic Man] was developed. It has been shown that man has many interests other than his interest in money; that he desires security, leisure, independence, justice, and freedom in many forms. The virtually unlimited human wants and the efforts expended to satisfy them from limited resources is a much broader concept than conceived by the classical writers.

— John Fred Bell, *Economic Man

CRAFTED, painted figurine Stenciled with pastoral scene,
 Oil of lavender, tangerine, Toll-free phone.

Pair of plushest polar bear, Polypropylene underwear, Bisqueware, folk art angel hare, Stone, ecru, bone.

Engraved keepsake apple plaque, Snappy tramper fanny pack,
 Olive, crimson haversack, Flask for schnapps!

Hand-crafted breakfast basket,
 Coeur d'amour, bomber jacket,
 Side pocket for squash racquet, Ratchet strap.

* Encyclopedia Britannica

Enameled tin biscuit box, Soft and springy rubber socks,
Blast-resistant, new mailbox,
No more moles!

Breakthrough! Hands-free head strap lamp, Trademark vise-grip locking clamp, Hinged steel lightweight traction ramp,
Five quart bowls,

Classic diner coffee mug, Bobbin lamp and whiskey jug, Variegated braided rug.
Anjou pear,

Wine or taupe, mahogany,
Expedite delivery,
Uses six 'D' batteries,
Keep some spare.

Fifteen-minute highway flare, Zircons, rhinestone solitaire, Prove you love her, buy a pair!
Porcelain pig.

Carries wallet, change and key,
Unconditional guarantee.
Ripe bing cherries, bosc and brie, Stir-fry pan,

Savory and sage, anise, chive.
Jet-a-way broom hoses drive,
A dollar two ninety-five,
Keyless chuck.

Almond cream, chocolate truffle, Forest green overstuffed duffel, Pillow sham, twin dust ruffle, Eider duck.

Aqua rubber octopus,
Turquoise hippopotamus,
Signed by artist — just for us!
Dog-eared page,

Chocolate puppy, tortoise comb,
Kitchen cubbies, garden gnome, Christmas pickle, toll-free phone.
Dishwasher safe

Terra cotta berry jar, Lunar phases calendar,
Pocket-sized monocular, Three-tiered box.

Quilted dove embroidery Chickadee and chicory, Optional rotisserie,
Bright-eyed fox,

Hand knitted kitten sweater, Shoulder strap seeder/spreader, Guaranteed, ours are better,
Made by monks.

Orange earmuff, safety visor, Lucite hardware organizer,
Three-way circuit analyzer, Plaid, jade, check,

Softest, thickest English chamois, Oriental origami
Or Thuringian salami.
Credit card, check

Patchwork tree skirt, baking tile,
Cut glass, blown glass, flower vial,
Hand-cast bird bath, brass sun dial,
Please don't touch!

Shaker maker secretary,
Candelabra topiary,
(May exchange if necessary) Wallet/coin clutch.

Polished Vermont marble coaster, Threatened northern wildlife poster, Telescoping wiener roaster, Drawstring pouch.

On the mantle, chalkware cats.
In the foyer, welcome mats.
Out in backyard, house for bats, Santa on skis.

Beaujolais and Côtes du Rhone, Perugina panettone,
Napkins, linens: ecru, stone, Teal, taupe, maize.

Arctic salmon, nectarine, Baggy, pleated, stretch waist jean.
After supper, plump praline, Scented log,

Fireside tongs, hand carved handles,
Patented rose, beeswax candles.
Mirth and cheer, frustrates vandals, Faithful dog,

Painted egg, sheepskin slipper.
Privately, nose-hair clipper Stowed away, nylon zipper, Bristle hair brush.

Current resident, just for you,
Any three for price of two,
Cobalt, fuchsia, azure blue.
Phone, fax, rush.

MEASURING E. B. WHITE'S BOATHOUSE

Does the over-blown graveside crock of dust-spattered striped silk lilies, the withered linden transplant, the brusque kiss of the grass trimmer against frost-fractured lichen-stained Carrara spook among the dead some tedious unutterable ache of transience and of missed regard?

Is their disposition soothed (as surely ours is) by the seep of borrowed water, in the shade of slate, stealing through the roots of a lone begonia, its deadheads lovingly pinched?
. . . or amused by the pageant near the chain-link fence where, in July sun, tomatoes in pots set fruit?

Do our erratic trespasses, uninvited across their haunts, ripple their glassy dreams like a buzzing fly tickling a sleeping dog's ear?

And is the author pleased (He must be — say, he must) to flicker on in strangers' thoughts, as echoed verbs, escaping the choke of dust-smudged boards, darkened leaves split open in a crack of light, ignite, with a snap of aptness, a quick twitch of cheek, a sudden mis-rhythm of expelled breath, an awkward irritation in the corner of one eye?

Or does he weary, marionette at our synapse strings, sapped by reprise, footnoted prisoner behind the filamental webs of images set fly, for him, too long ago,

(Stanza continued)

the juice of truth now dried?
And if so, does he wince to see us, map, biography and tape measure in hand, winding up the two-track garden path?

What shadow of lyric spirit, perennially abstracted in April's pipping promise, now shies behind the baleful black unblinking glare of the windows of that empty house?
(Someone else's now — and, either way, not ours!)

Yet, outside the confine of the pickets, beyond the regimented apple trees — crutched, grown old in service — through the tamed fields, where a kingbird perches, leads the way (quick, to escape that black, black glare!) down into the soothing unmowed cool and green of woods, balsam, tamarack, black spruce, to the curve of cove,

where by the rip rap, there, conserved, sits the weathered shingled shack (just like in the picture!)
compact island on salt glazed lawn:
. . . seventeen foot ten by thirteen four.

Two south six-over-sixes let in dusk across an absent shoulder, left, gone from the southeast corner seat.
Through an in-swinging awning, east light diffuses on a narrow table, without typewriter, from which unspooled one man's faith in freedom, predication, and the egg.
The door, . . . unlatched.
(but who could dare?)

Three Poems

A TENDENCY TOWARD ORDER

Beyond physical laws,
she thought,
balanced on a branch, tossing out an apple;
descending,
captured the red sweet shape out of thin air, round and fresh.

She startled herself by drifting, a gradual fall across the table of periodicity.
Once light,
electronically slender,
now she entered groups of metals, numbered, solemnly,
 by increasing weight.

“Positions are assigned according to mass and configuration.”

Shifting, she slid, slipping numbers;
particles travelled to the shell beneath.
She had formed endless bonds;
now they diminished in a doubtful equilibrium punctuated by loss.

“Periods are horizontal, groups are vertical.”

. . . numbered irrevocably from one to eight.

The final column is zero:
inert (or noble) elements, reacting

with great difficulty.

Now she loves by the eightfold way:

by diameter,
by common valence,
melting and boiling points,

density,
by her eccentric orbit;

for her dark companion star, her distinct types of magnetism.

A rare earth in three flavours, she is up down strange.

SITE SPECIFIC

Beneath a lichenous crust, glacial boulders stand,
silent under the high trees, stiff rock faces turned away.

A black rubber tube runs through the white pine forest, its matte skin stencilled, at intervals, with

Triangle 1 and 1/4"
100 PSI
Hi-flexible pipe
D 2239
7J4.

The pipe juts out of a clapboard pumphouse, receives two metal collars, runs into a rigid white plastic elbow, reappears, is fitted with two stainless steel bands, ratcheted on tight, and proceeds with

7J4
Triangle 1 and 1/4"
100 PSI
Hi-flex
D 2239,

runs over pine needles,
across flat rock,
disappears down the slope.

There is very little to be said in such a still place.

The only conversation is among the swarm of white dots in dim air, bright blue bodied insects with black-strutted wings and plume-y white tails that disintegrate in my hand.

LOVE SONG

"The enormous waxflower has a labellum over a foot long and attracts a moth with a tongue of equal length."

Highly specialized,
"curiously modified" in form,
the petals,
swollen sepals, present a conspicuous lip, honey wet.

Exotica: cattleya,
vanilla,
habenaria,
dendrobium (with its pendant clusters), epidendrum, odontoglossum.

Domestica: pink-blossomed slipper of Venus ("common"), fringed twayblades, bearded swamp rose,
grass pinks,
pearl twist (or "lady tress"), rattlesnake plantain.

Your slippy sweetness glistens on wooden saint's toes; in sacred dark, candle and sweat scent.

At night, I pull you over my head like a snug hat and wear your waxy pollen on my hairy wings, a golden coat.

THE WATER BEARER

Damn. He was here and now he's gone.
Follow that trail and I think you'll find him down by the old spring, where the cold water never stops unless he wants it to.
He'll be hunkered in some ferny place between two mossgrown trees, with that bucket he dips the water with, and the air around all quivering green. But listen: If his back is turned, and likely it will be, better wait till he turns again and takes time to see you and his light fades down to normal brightness.
Otherwise you might not know you're there.

Frank Conaway

GRASSFIRE

Here it comes again, drenching sweet grass in flame — like a conduit, the traction of a deep breath sucking in every air like undertow from here to there, untangling from the undergrowth, fast and hard and high.
Here the fire, hurtling like a boulder hurled through space, hurting molecules, ripping apart atoms, exploding like a blurted secret. There is the taper, the point, the coil:
what it all comes down to: unraveling, blowing up into vastness. Arrow of fire, wounding.
Red surge weeping and more redness swept over this injury, this blame, this absence of grass.
But look, I think I could be swimming, diving down defying the element that would consume me, turn me smooth as clay, burn me to tender ash. I could wade in to these waves and float through that color, that heat.
And perhaps with my hands I could draw the thunder of this wild grassfire through the field, urge it on, entice it on to the pond for its denouement where it hisses its one last sigh. Our eyes are filled with small black wings.
Let the wind rage, let us now come clean.
Yes the grass is singed; let it grow back, bright green.

Alice B. Fogel

SET DESIGN FOR THE CITY

for David Dawson

Each year, when one end of the football field was transformed into an opera set, my friend's father — a chamber musician — played viola in the orchestra, his annual concession, he said, to bombast.

The summer I was fourteen I went with them to rehearsals for Aida. With the first updraft of strings I closed my eyes, saw oblique streets climb through a walled city.

A girl with a leopard showed me a footpath lined with lady slippers and poppies, smooth petals sliding against us as we ascended to her garden baths.

The singers, knowing they could look ahead only to separation and death, lingered in this hill town, unwilling to leave through any of its seven gates.

The night of the opera I compared my sets with the arch of Thebes a chorus of slaves lugged into place and the temple the conductor seemed to summon from the turf as the king's retinue approached on weary elephants.
Splendid, all of it, but uninhabitably grand:
I longed for the intimacy of my hanging gardens where orchids rustled over perfumed water.

One night that summer, after we knew my friend's father was dying, we listened from our beds as he practiced Beethoven. Eyes closed, head bent down over his bow, he kept rehearsing as if one last concert had not been canceled. I imagined him performing in a twilight garden, a place of fountains just inside the city walls, colors softening into blues, hills, night.

But when I woke later and found him still playing I was in the presence of something too wild to fit into my imagined city. Watching from the stairs, I saw how he had stripped to his waist — playing without a score, he assaulted each phrase so savagely that at times the notes could no longer be heard, pressed up into whatever country he alone fashioned.

Theodore Deppe

SEA BRAIDS

I pick up hair along the beach, green strands with pods.

I braid it into my own hair shells dangling like earrings.

I walk along tile sand's hips where the water's tongue stops,
great sea braids trailing down my belly, like furry arms loving the dome that rose unwanted.

The curve of the coast
mimics the shape of my shadow, bending female bursting wide.

There are ribs in the waves that rise like smooth bones
inhaling the earth, drawing my body with it into its blue belly.

I have my baby on moss-covered rocks and gently release her into the arms of the night nurse, wrapped in

sea braids
and shells.

Tenaya Darlington

Two Poems

MOUNT ST. PETER, MAASTRICHT

Neither so ruminant nor so placid the cows astray in the caves of St. Peter butt and bellow and heave against the marl.
 These then must be the nether lands, dark and tunneled, as the cows grow certain of their mistake, sea serpents, centaurs, crabs, salt-mouthed clams, jawbones of catamount and dreadwolf edging out in high relief from walls hewn with charcoal daemons, goat-beards, monkeys, cunts, pricks, sacred harts, burnt regiments of beasts of prayer.
 The cows whinny; they bray; they snarl;
 they howl beneath the Mount, wanting nothing to do with fossil, psalm, or subterfuge, blue men in masks once smuggled past rhino, behemoth, Mauser, back again across the Channel.
 Ten thousand passages, scores of caverns, hundreds upon hundreds of scarred initials, arrows through hearts black, brown, white, cleft, scraped, stamped, and the cows stamp too, how they stamp hoofprints, hoofprints deeper than impatience: horror, and befoul themselves in these close quarters, wanting but their green fields, polders to graze in the light of day.

Four pieces of silver to follow the childguides through the ancient maze of the Southern Labyrinth a rainy Sunday afternoon when sixty of us, all eyes, come upon the cows.

 Our lanterns throw their great trembling shadows, paleolith, up onto the walls, their round eyes blinking, their heads bowing in gaunt chalk circles, their bodies shaking with our unsteadiness.

I'd been to the Perigord, in whose huge caves ochre hands sign for the deaf we've come to be,
and the aurochs run with signatures of spear,
and woolly mammoth sink their tusks into the lime.

But the cows are more implausible, as if fallen four-footed from a Calvinist grace, unsanctioned and at a loss for innocence, beating their prints into the tunnel floors with sound and fury, speaking in tongues, snorting, bleating, growling, groaning, hissing, amazed in the wrong place at the wrong time, encumbered by the unfamiliar heat of so many strangers, queered witnesses gathering in stone pastures.

Now a cow begins to calve, shuddering, and the caves become ineluctably animal,
rank and sweet with afterbirth licked and eaten, intimations of milk, solitudes of blood.

A man spasms. A woman sucks for air. A couple weeps.
Shielding their lights, the childguides watch closely for signs of panic among the cows, who however have been calmed
by the calving and stand still half-lit upon the walls watching as quietly over the twin calves as over us.

Later we will lead them out, the calves in all our arms, shared from one to the next from hall to hall, up stone ramps and down, through the tunnels and arches, past horned men and dark-hipped women, into the rain and the green fields above the river Maas, a November day, gray and cool and unremarkable.
Selah.

RANCHO COASTAL HUMANE SOCIETY THRIFT SHOP SUTRA

Light green as lotus leaf at Benares dawn the Buddha sits before the albums, Petula, Mahalia, calypso, mambo, samba, raga, limbo, blue paper dot pressed to his forehead. Beyond, dots dance the mandala of the fourteen indeterminates, where blue is a single buck.
 The Buddha is small as a beggar's cup, felt bottomed, Mexican jade, heavy as a hand full of rice, still as abandoned temple bells beneath the Stones, the Doors, the Grateful Dead.
 The change, the eagles, the four quarters click and ring in the pocket of my sweats.
 This must be the original, Gautama, Sakyamuni Buddha, bo tree hanging from wires above, embossed with Greenpeace: doe, fawn, stag grazing through a deerpark of shelves, stiff, ceramic; disciples in dhotis meditating upon cases of Once Is Not Enough, Looking for Mr. Goodbar. Is there ever an afterwards?
 they asked. Yes, until the end, said the Buddha.
 What end? they asked. Aluminum walkers? Handwarmers?
 Bifocals? Rubber sheets? The Buddha sits silent as an empty Walkman before Country Joe & the Fish, the Four Horsemen, the Tabernacle Choir. What end? they asked. Armless bears? Headless dogs? Legless tables? Spineless chairs? You break it you take it — dharma and karma of the second hand. Do Time Steps with Tony, Sing Along with Mitch, Stretch with Bonnie, Carol with Andy, Pray with Jim and Tammy. What end? they asked. Wax fruit? Wooden fish? I lift the Buddha up: no visible imperfections. Satchmo, the Duke, Dizzy, Brubeck, the Bird lie below, all the worse for where they are, hoarse and scored under the weight of 78s, sleeves black with praise, astonishment, and high fidelity. To what shall we trust? they asked.

To the Eightfold Path, he said. Spoons, bowls, forks, knives, stoneware plates, teacups, tumblers, napkin rings. I am moving with him through the aisles.
Are we thus enchanted? they asked him.
Must all be illusion? Look, he said. Cameos, bracelets, scarves, hairpins, candlesticks, golden anniversary watches — look but do not desire.
Half-Price Day today: four bits a Buddha.
That's the last of them, the lady says. Gone fast, those. Is there a fatedness to things? they asked.
There is a wheel, he said. He sits behind in the hollows of my blue pannier, on the back of my eight-speed, as I pedal down Santa Fe, west toward the Pacific, then north on 101.
He sits within two days' news inside a Safeway bag to keep him whole. Is there any hope, they asked, of permanence, of wisdom and permanence?
He pointed to a squawking parrot in the pipal.
A ring-necked parrot, emerald and scarlet,
like the one beside him in the paper bag, swaddled in sports and editorial. Fired clay, Guadalajara perhaps, for the tourist trade.
The parrot remembers, he said, and to what avail?
Is there then no meaning? they asked. We are home now. The Buddha sits intact above The Lady Sings the Blues and smiles. He will sit there in my house ten or twelve years and then, moving to another state, I will lose him.
The parrot I have to this very day, on this very desk.

Hillel Schwartz

EQUINOX

The night of the first day of spring
I was walking across our dogturd of a campus With a cramp in my foot and suddenly felt like I stepped on a spike — iron, not crocus —
And danced on one leg in podiatric agony.
This shouldn't have happened at all,
Wearing the shoes with my storebought Metatarsal pads I thought fixed me for life Before the ban, before A.P.A., The American Podiatrists Association
Sued Doctor Scholls for practicing foot medicine Without a license and Scholls folded, Yanked my metatarsal pads in supine Acquiescence. What self-defeating shame,
As if those mauve unwholesome and adhesive Little valentines stuck toward the upper End of your arch were not merely the color Of ox tongue but somehow swole
In their attentive and supportive caress of this Secret, tender portion of the sole,
As if the nearby ball of the foot were Eve's Equivalent of Adam's apple in place To tease and torment a serpent. What did I care, Spiked in the hoof. I'd been teaching Yeats, Making fun of Yeats, the young people smooching
All over the place, so he's going to sail
To some perfect Byzantium of the mind
And become a totally golden cuckoo.
I had not thought he'd so confessed himself A raging idiot. Or that ugly sonnet, Full of lurid, dirty-old-man fascination
With the swan's "feathered glory"
Forcibly entering Princess Leda, Asking if she put on airs of grandeur
After her adventure with the Olympic tickler,
The whole thing pulsing with envy:

Why doesn't God clutch me with black webs
And ravish my head unto eternity?
I hurried home and ate a banana for my foot,
For the phosphorus — I mean potassium,
The last thing I need is to glow in the dark,
For what I was now calling a muscle spasm, Though I could have anything, warts, Stress fracture, tendonitis of my plantar fascia.
That stab in my foot's sore ball was spring Sending me a signal of my mortality And I was sad. There would be aches, More and more, until the convulsive finale,
That great mindlessness of the last black Equinox, wrapped in petals of breathless Pain like a bee drowning in a flower, Until Cuchulain, patron ghost of Ireland
According to foolish, furious Yeats, Could wreak oblivion on all merely Fatuuous friends and fatuuous enemies.
Welcome to cold hell, he will whisper,
And then slash and stab us with his claymore
As the swan did Leda, again and again and again.

Kenneth Rosen

A WALK AT THE END OF THE CENTURY

Last night in the southwest quadrant of the sky, a light, low and yellow, too bright for planet or star, besides it glowed. It lit the clouds. I said it was the moon reduced — the last dot phase before dying. You laughed. A new astronomy for a new age. And we both thought of the fat-cheeked face of our old comfort peeking in the car playing now-you-see-me-now-you-don't through trees, forgetting who in its high white wig of bone points f'accuse through our bedroom window. We walked.

And except for talk of strange light where the moon's last crescent should have been, we spoke of news and the French doctor's face in East Africa who knelt holding his hands over a huddle of bones like a boy scout feeling for fire in an arrangement of sticks—this pencil, an arm, this, a thigh, and that swollen knob, the skull, eyes drilling from its holes. I know. It goes on goes on, something about cycles. But tell me —

When Death's head is screwed onto a child, easy as a light bulb, how do beginning and end come full circle and not add up to zero? And how can a body, eaten down to laser or probe of light, be bright enough for conscience but not cure?

Alice Friman

BEFORE I BECAME LIKE EVERYONE ELSE . . .
AND THEN DECIDED TO STOP

Scott Thomas is not too OLD and not too YOUNG,
but he has

BLUE-LEMON EYES

that are THICKER than Tolstoy's War and Peace and DEEPER than the part of the POOL with the DARK "10" STENCILED beside it . . .

It always feels like I'm gonna' be EATEN by them, or all of a sudden I'm gonna' see a BIG, OLD BULLFROG
HOPPING LAZILY from and to each
LILY PAD.

Scott Thomas is not too OLD and not too YOUNG,
but he has

SUN-SCENTED, CHESTNUT HAIR

that is SOFTER than my GRANDMOTHER'S bedding (she didn't ever use DETERGENT) and sometimes when he lets the SUN get a GOOD, HARD LOOK at him, each HAIR, each and every LOCKE will turn the COLOR of BRANDY (he DRINKS it sometimes, you know. . .)

Scott Thomas is not too OLD and not too YOUNG,
but he has

DAWN-PINK LIPS

that are LARGE, but not too BIG to SCARE me. Sometimes when he POUTS, his BOTTOM HALF looks like a PLATFORM, a DIVING BOARD, but I couldn't JUMP . . .
I'm too AFRAID of HEIGHTS!

SHARP

Poet of Parris Island

"Cock crows, wolf bays, caterwauls, eldritch sounds ringing out and echoing

Back from the escarpment, weird screams meant to terrify, crazily

Announcing attack across fogbound spiderwebs of barbed wired

Terrain. Then the poop of mortars, the red spit of burps, A flare, shedding chartreuse in its lazy swaying gravity fall,

Beautiful tracers burning out in air, phosphorous grenades making

Small midnight suns. . ." Buck Sergeant Robert E. Lee Sharp of Macon read

To his captive audience of Marine recruits his poems of Korean

Conflict — recruits who had, night before, waded the blind-dark swamp of the Sea Island called Parris, shitbirds and turds up to their chins in

Swamp gump, whipped on and kicked by water moccasins, Mae-Wested

In the dark by boa constrictors, or so they believed.
All but Clover,

Descendant of Sea Island plantation slaves, cursing the mouthfuls

Of swampwash in gurgling Gullah, the islands' lingo, who knew the snakes

Would be scared off by such commotion as this — two hundred-some farm

Boys and city slickers scared spineless in the snakes' swamp — knew

(stanza continued)

It was drowning to be feared, in the slippery dark, burdened with

Fifty-pound packs rifles helmets cartridgebelts canteens bayonets and night-

Blind eyes, under a starproof vegetable roof of shingling fronds and fans.

Clover stretched his neck like a turtle above the din of clanks

Splashes and shouts of terror. And always above any din Sharp's mellifluous

Georgian, urging, commanding a motley crew of shitbirds and turds to become

Marines, who himself was Poster-Marine, whose men thought him perfect

But for the fact that he was mad as the hatter, perfect, but for

His constant, barely-submerged violence, which was the song behind his words

Now, as he read with great beauty, vivid clarity, his martial Poems of nightmare mayhem on Bunker Hill and Snipers Ridge, where

He won a chestful of medals, a seemingly mad hero Marine poet

Drill instructor, angrier than God. At what? War, the poems told, at war,

At human nature, at himself, filled with his own violence;
at us, too,

But to save us, always to make us triumph over what he had endured, cried:

"Coming! Outposts in! The sand-bagged weight of the bunker collapsed

Under artillery — a full barrage — pf-f-f-f BOOM — and the Reds slid

In on us. Got one under my arm and slit his throat. Now tell me about

(stanza continued)

Mao, I said; I'll tell you about freedom, you two-mouthed bastard!" Sharp scanned

Us, in our skivvies on the squad bay floor, across the little table he Brought to his recitals. "Unnerstay-end," he growled, "Mr. Kennan in Washington has devised for America a policy of containment. The Reds Cain't continue to eat if they don't swallow up other countries.

They don't

Create wealth, they re-dis-tri-bute it. Get me? They are an empire.

Unnerstay-end what that is? They gotta eat up their neighbors

Or else they collapse. Unnerstay-end? Do you dumb shitbirds

Unnerstay-end what it's all about, what Bunker Hill was about — either

One? About FREEDOM, you dumb turds, FREEDOM! You eat enough 'gator-

Doo, you'al'll learn. One o' them Reds shoots your balls off — Non Emasculatatum est —" Off in another reality field, Sharp whispers, "My Best buddy, from Valdosta. . ." Back. "You gonna priss like girls when you march.

We gonna win the base ensign. I don't care a fiddler's bitch if the Red flag goes up at a hunnerd-ten degrees. You gonna priss like girls.

You gonna look PRETTY. Get me? And you know what you gonna be? Do

(stanza continued)

You? You gonna be God bless America Uncle Sam's most perfect killers.

Now what you gonna be?" SIR, killers, SIR! "Makes my heart sing.

And if the army and the navy ever get to heaven's scene. . .
What, dammit?"

They will find the streets are guarded by United States Marines, Sir!

E. M. Schorb

Three Poems

I WANT

I want nothing I made made happen nothing, god forbid, I earned.
I want
something wicked:
black pigroast wanton with juice, royal-colored raspberries swooning in cream, opals to twine their fiery light like knives, ah, you here, now.

THE CATFISH SONG

Bring the war skillet heavy enough to kill,
black as the silky spot under the tongue,
the secret stomach squeezing in the dark.
Heat it to throbbing over open fire past smoke to ash.
Toss ball of butter, flesh of peppered fish o red white black o lush black sizzle fiery catfish song for all the greedy places light never goes.

DAFFODIL

Quick — think something not daffodil.
That girl
tasting the first blithe air, her hair a rich black knot.
See how the light
gentles the yellow bell of her shirt, how her head lilts on its green stem.

J. Cordary

ANOTHER WHITE CLOUD OF MOTHS

Listen! The sound you hear is not the straining of pale green buds presaging spring. It is the rustle of twenty million jaws of dust tilting upward like speechless poppies.

Listen! The sound you hear is not the scratching of field mice making their home. It is the rasping of busy pens redrawing the map of Europe. A different kind of claws.

Do not deceive yourself. The fireworks from the mountain are not in celebration of your right to live in peace among your neighbors.
The face of evil looks out from the mirrors of Europe.
No one can claim they did not know.

TODAY I WASTED MY LIFE

for Thich Nhat Hanh

I did not delight in the drag of the spoon through the soup, the slow dissolve of the edges of the bouillon cube, the taste of salt.

I hardly noted the airy dryness of the ferns as I lifted their fronds, nor stayed a moment watching the water I'd poured seep into the soil at the edge of the pots.

I did not savor the mist, the cold coming on, nor revel in the hard lift, the forward press of the shoulders,
the heft of the wheelbarrow, heavy, burdened in the slosh and slick of the mud, the grass plastered against the clay.

Night came down with all its constellations turning, and the whippoorwill sang his name from one tree and then another.

Ryland Bruhwiler

Two Poems

LIGHTING THE LAMP

Long ago on the open prairies, nights stretched out full and heavy like black bears sleeping oblivious to the sting of the high mosquito stars.

And even in the Kansas of my boyhood, for miles the night's hide lay unpunctured.
Our chores and milking finished,
we sat under the cedars, waiting for the house to cool, while jet blotted the barn and inked away the west.
Cicadas and crickets had already polished the dark to a sheen before we found our way lightless to bed.
We slept quietly in its deep black hand.

It was altogether different in winter, when early dusk frightened us to the kitchen where Mom worked on in a darkening house; we hungered wordlessly for the lighting of the lamp, for the flare of the sulphur match and the leap of shadows, her own looming on the wall behind her as she touched the wick aflame.
The smell of kerosene, and the long wait for the Aladdin mantle to warm, before she eased the flame up and a glow pushed outward into the room.
Like chicks to a hen, we drew under the skirt of our mother's light.
Now the dark could only crouch

(Stanza continued)

behind the wood box. Upstairs it waited, though, in a cold room where later we would have to climb, lifting high only the candle's tiny trembling umbrella.

When we were older, a greater fear was the winter dark that hunkered outside where we might be called upon to walk with swinging lantern alongside our huge striding and scissoring shadow to a barn full of beasts and cats' eyes.

A hundred kinds of Kansas dark taught me all the stories of light.

Which I forget. Now. Here. Almost.
Under this fluorescent glare.

Tonight, at the edges of cities, darkness sniffs like a snail furred animal, hesitates — and dreaming only a thin ghost of itself forward through the alleys, it cringes in yard corners and cowers under cars waiting to mewl with a slight and domesticated dark tossed out from the houses with the flick of a wrist.
Hounded by instant incandescence, it breeds nervously, is nearly extinct. Reclusive and odorless, no one has noted it for years.

Having lost touch with darkness we ourselves grow shadowy and weightless.
Taking the light too lightly our bones grow birdlike, and we threaten to float unmoored from the earth.

But the gravity that pulls me back, like weights in my shoes, is memory, and how the immense dark backed from the bright circle spreading from my mother's hands on the lamp.

WATCHING MY MOTHER'S BREATH

for Regina Mersmann

(born Oct. 15, 1899; died Aug. 28, 1990)

For hours after the stroke you were like a house being closed; one after one the blinds came down.

Now on this high bed, your face says death, but your heart clings to an old habit; you have not been here for days.

You sleep and sleep, as if to sleep for all those nights waking with children in the cold house.

I put drops in your eyes, swab your dry, gaping mouth with a sponge, say to you the few things we would not have known how to listen to together.

Beyond washboard and breadboard now, your thin body is pulled into the sheets by an immense and eloquent fatigue. Will you have to sleep for years before you can go on ahead?

In unmistakable stages your breathing alters; sometimes stumbles, and stops — then, comes again, weaker from a deepening cave.

Ninety years of sand hurries from the hourglass, back toward its first ocean.

In you now breath backs slowly away bowing towards the wings; the flame wavers smaller and smaller, re-entering the ember.

All those years of gardens arrange themselves in the palm of your hand.

In the root cellar, potatoes settle shoulder to shoulder;
the rock weighing down the plate on the kraut jar falls more deeply asleep.

In your ears, violin cases wrap themselves shut over the gleaming wood; chairs are being stacked and leaned against the wall.

In your mouth the table is cleared for the last time, the floors swept and shining.

Time moves away down the walk, waving goodbye.

Your sleep slides deeper, your breath rocking you lower and lower into your self, back through the rings within rings to the hut in the woods where the master takes your head in his hands smiling at your perfection;

and leads you to the hearth where you crawl into the fire, and the sky opens its hand, full of stars, and the wren's eye looks out bright from the hole of her small house.

James Mersmann

IMMUNITY

Sue Hubbell, new to the woods of Missouri, rolled up her sleeve and gave her arm to the bees, let them lodge their splinters in her, increasing the number of bees each week until her body learned, till antibodies to the poison built up in her blood and the bee stings left no mark.
Then she could walk among them in ordinary clothes, her open face exposed to them, and touch their honey with her hands.

Maybe sometime when the front door closes again and I watch my father eradicated again by the door, I will find nothing but my body, smooth as Sue Hubbell's after she became immune to bees, when she sat on the floor checking her arms and back for stings.

Ann Keniston

AFTER THE ATTACK

I hinge one of my ribs to either side of the doorway.
I stir my father's muscles into mortar.
I carry my mother's eyes in my palm for setting in stone above the entrance.

I am building a house for Joanna, my youngest sister, designed to protect her.

I regret its late construction — I had thought, She is only thirteen, believing she had a few more years of safety.

I walk to the nearest hill and look back.
There is no house, there is no sanctuary.
There are bricks I want to heft.
There is a sharpened pole where I want to place his head.

Carrie Etter

BOOKS IN BRIEF

Heather McHugh, Broken English: Poetry and Partiality (Hanover, New Hampshire: Wesleyan University Press/University Press of New England, 1993, 152 pp., $35. cloth, $14.95 paper); Hinge & Sign (same publisher, 1994, 240 pp., same prices).

As if in response to Hazard Adams's complaint, in the New Princeton Encyclopedia of Poetry and Poetics, that our era lacks discourse "by an artist defending or promoting a practice," or by a critic concerned with specific literary values, here appear Heather McHugh's companion volumes of critical essays and new and selected poems. Together they offer insight into a significant aspect of poetry in our time.

Back when I was first reading and trying to write poetry, we assumed we could identify a "poem" by such criteria as meter and rhyme.

Liza Grapeman alre mindus Weaken maker, Liza Blime, Andy Parton, Lee B. Hindus, Footbrin Johnnie sans a dime.

Whether it made "sense" or not, measure and rhyme defined it as poem. What, today, takes the place of these conventions? Cadence, surely, in the musical sense. And for many of our finest poets, an intensity of language, including a sophisticated knowledge of a word's etymology and its layered nuances. Each word is a prism, rewarding the reader who knows to turn it in the mind for fresh flashes of sense and senses. Until well into this century, most poets absorbed philology with their classical educations. When Frost contrasts sex with "grex," he assumes a reader who knows or knows how to learn the root of "gregarious." When Elizabeth Bishop writes, "and looked and looked our infant sight away," we need to know that the original meaning of infant was one incapable of speech. Heather McHugh goes farther than this. She deconstructs words to aerate their roots and encourage their branching. She quotes Creeley, "Position is where you put it," and adds, "Given the fire of language, exposition is (etymologically speaking) where you put it out." The wit in this writing is exhilarating, and the insight into poetry is moving. Poetry is no analgesic; it "requires you to face the difficulty, the unfathomability, of your life." The implication for McHugh is a "broken language," enabling a poetry of two minds. "In poetry, by definition, the making of lines is the breaking of lines. . . . Poetic language is language in which meaning refuses to be single-minded: the transitivity of meaning splits, as we mean more than we intend. More like evidence than judgment, the well-created poem can present several versions at once; it is the site of possibility." Every line-end, every margin, breaks open. "It is a framer's art, and the frame is a part (not apart), a way (not away)." In her essay "Broken, As in English: What We Make of Fragments," McHugh makes a metaphysics of fragmentation. Even more I enjoyed "A Genuine Article," a veritable Versailles fountain of liquid juggling of a's, an's, and the's. And on top of that, I relished "What Dickinson Made a Dash For: Interpretive Insecurity as Poetic Freedom," opening with the challenging sentence: "It is no accident that book, sentence, and pen are the terms not only of artistic profession, but of penal containment." Here she supplies what Hazard Adams has called for: discourse by a critic concerned with "specifically literary value" and with the "particular excellences of a given literary work." Her readings of Dickinson are delicate and illuminating. It pleases me that she reads Dickinson's fragmentations and ellipses as extending the ambidextrousness, the ambiguities, the ambivalences in the words to the protean possibilities of syntax. The prosody is the necessary clew/clue leading the poet to the "barely dictable, certainly not predictable" vision. I also value McHugh's presentation (her present to us) of the poetry of the Yoruba people of western Africa – a celebratory analysis.

McHugh confides that both as writer and reader, and as a "student of phenomena" and a "sensual being in nature," she works to "study and then remark patterns: occurrences, recurrences, currents." To see how theory and practice have evolved since the first half of this century, one could profitably compare Frost's essay "The Constant Symbol" and his poetic practice with Heather McHugh's essays and works. (There's a nice master's thesis for someone. You're welcome.)

As I turn to McHugh's poems, I carry with me not only the theoretical insights from her essays but this statement: "To my eye and my ear, the poem has always been a graphically and score; and to my mind, mind's meat." Most of her poems are too long to quote here in their entirety, but here's one from the new poems that open the volume:

Curve

Freezeburn forms whirlpools and bearfur has curve.

My line is gravity's sheer vertical.

Memory's the same seme. Sail a memo down: there's the spooled real: plunge into simulcast. Caught up in the network is a blue planet, spinner par excellence.

It's too small.
Throw it back.

Now I'd say this was classy poetry if I didn't know that anyone who says classy isn't. But it surely does have class. Polished, elegant, poised. Very well-educated. In eras past, a classical education defined one's class. One had one's semes straight. Today, such class has the smell of the classroom. What Coleridge and Shelley took for granted, McHugh self-consciously patterns in a literate dance. (I'd classify McHugh as an intensely self-conscious poet, though by no means do I mean self-absorbed.) We initiated readers (we fit audience though few) know ourselves to be a privileged class. Others may have to go to school to learn in the classroom how to follow and delight in such delicious scores as "Curve." With the right class of students, what a joy to discuss it line by line! The slithery cadences, the jaunty alliterations and assonances, the surreal images in the double nouns! The effrontery of the punning. The little shocks of surprise as we bound off into white space at each line-end and then rebound into an unpredictable per- or concept. The exuberant infectiousness of it! The shock of the ending. Then the rewards of rereading, after the sneaky metaphor has revealed itself. The re-rereading for all the patterns of sound and sense and dramatic movement here compacted. And the final open question (the bait) concealed in the misleadingly solid statements in the last stanza. The poem is indeed a class act.

Many of my readers are at home in this post-modern classroom. Some, I know, are not. To these latter I had better say quickly that in a way I pitched you a curve in picking this small poem as my example. Even among the twenty-seven new poems in this collection, there is a rich variety of voices and patterns. One of my favorites, "What He Thought," is a limpid first-person narrative in the simplest colloquial language, telling a story that I would not presume to describe for fear of preempting your own private privilege of experiencing this profound and moving poem.

Let me pick a more representative poem to examine: "Some Kind of Pine," another of the new poems. It begins almost flippantly: "Mid-leap in her escape, the nymph/ is bushed." Aha! Daphne pursued by Apollo and turned to a laurel. It continues, "one hand turns out in/branches, tropes turn/helio." Well, you have to know what beliotrope literally means. And you have to know what a trope is. But at this point the trope of the poem could be anything. Still, the "graphicality" of the poem is established, both in the image of the myth and in the overall pattern of five short "movements," each divided more or less into four or five couplets of widely varying lengths. Our eye begins to read the "score," and our ear has already picked up the bounding ps in the first line, slowed to the bs of bushed, bursts, and branches. Each phoneme appears to cast itself ahead down the path to seek out its companions. Watch this musical pattern develop:

The hapless god has suffered some comeuppance, too:

he's stuck for good in his own stalking.

Hand anticipates hapless; and the sequence of s and of u sounds (two in comeuppance, five in the couplet) lead to the play in stuck and stalk. We should not be surprised that the next line begins "The maker's a remarker." Not only the sculptor of this particular statue (more explicit in the next "movement"), but of course the maker of the poem. She takes us, movement by movement, to the villa where the statue is, then to a literal tree outside her hotel window, in a very explicit "now." The poem evolves in clear steps from the brittle wit and slangy diction (bushed) and the outward gaze of the beginning to an inner and personal space. Of the conifers she continues:

I'm moved by them, now that I've come to rest, from so many thousands of words (numbered space, named time). I stand
*
at planet-speed, struck dumb before such patiences as these, that surge for years to crown in great calm altitudes, in starful prongs. How did they get so far? They leave us to our babbling, they ignore the running reasons of the human stream; they pour into the sky. That's what they're standing for:
for standing fast. They are a sign We shall not overcome, except in undergoing more . . .

That's the end of the poem – an ellipsis. The trope has established a time/space continuum and developed great depth and altitude. The music has also deepened and become more lofty, with, in the final movement, conventional rhymes, internal and external, and the lines – to the ear in counterpoint to the eye – moving in cadences of traditional iambic pentameter, trimeter and tetrameter. The wit is still there, but become more structural and more serious: "standing for" / "standing fast"; "overcome" / "undergo." Is is, then, "to my mind, mind's meat," or, as Frost put it, the poem begins in delight and ends in wisdom.

M.K.S.